Nutraceuticals

Nutraceuticals are becoming more popular as consumers desire an inside out approach to anti-aging. But is there any science behind these beauty products? Studies have demonstrated that antioxidant supplements can provide additional photo-protection to help keep skin looking younger. Collagen hydrolysates are available in powders and drinks and help boost the supporting structure of the skin and improve skin hydration. For more on the science behind nutraceuticals join us for this years Science of Skincare Summit.

From the Chairs

It is with great pleasure that we present the second annual Science of Skincare Summit. In addition to our core curriculum on skincare ingredients, formulation, regulation, and regimen-building, the program now includes 2 new blocks of content. Friday's half-day symposium focuses on the selling of skincare, with experts in consumer behavior, merchandising, and branding. Another half-day seminar on Sunday highlights ingredients and formulation of hair and nail-care products and nutraceuticals. We have also expanded our panel discussions and added more education on peri-procedural and injectable skincare. To share more of this valuable information and provide a preview of the 2022 Summit content, we are bringing you this newsletter for more great tips, tricks and expertise regarding the science of skincare. We hope to also see you at our Summit in October.

Sincerely,

Patti Farris, MD & Ted Lain MD, MBA
